FRENCH SOCIETY.

Parisian Fashions and the Demi-Monde. Correspondence of the Cincinnati Gazette.] THE PUBLIC LEDGER IS PUBLISHED

It is a strange state of society which in one country permits notoriously bad and impure women to set fashions in dress, which are imitated and followed by the pure and virtuous women of the rest of the world. Strange as it is, it is nevertheless true. The leaders of the dead. The Public Lenger is served to city subscribers by faithful carriers at FIFTEEN CENTS PER WEEK, payable weekly to the carriers. The leaders of the demi-monde in Paris, as bold and shameless a class as can anywhere be found, are also the leaders of fashion. These also the leaders of fashion. These also the leaders of fashion. These women, who have, generally speaking, gained the position they occupy by their personal charms, are au fait in every art that will enhance them, and reckless and extravagant in the use of means to make these arts, conspicuous among these arts, conspicuous among the speaking. The area of the latter, and from the expense of the latter, and from the acquisition of Silesia by Frederick to Great, down to the campaign four years ago, Austria has a fered from the steady advances her young and powerful rival. Several years since, when the demi monde first came into fashion, a courageous lady of high rank, whose husband, ous lady of high rank, whose husband, report says, had been led away by a siren of that class, determined that she would see for herself in what the seductive power of these women consisted, which could allure men from pure homes and lawful wivez. Consequently she made up a party, who disguised themselves, and managed to gain entrance to one of the select masquerades given by a noted courtesan. A later writer states that the scandalously low dress worn at the present day at the French court, where three inches the actors are scattered among the hills, and along the sea-shore, to recall the en-tertainments of the winter and to asso-ciate the entertainers with the restful diversions which they need and deserve of corsage and one thickness of illusion is a woman's covering from the waist up, can be traced entirely to the influence of the demi monde. Private letters say that the failure of Madame Ollivier impose the high corsage upon Parisian society is due to the same cause. "The daughters of pleasure" laugh at and rid-icale it, and make themselves more at-tractive than ever in their decollete toilettes, having more influence in the salons than even the Empress on her throne. July and August they are strolling from sea side town to country village, giving our cousins a taste of the pleasures which we find so delightful during the winter season. Not that they like this constant work—this constant wearing of the sock and buskin, but the gains of these summer weeks furnish a temptation too strong to be resisted. One notable exception to this rule is to be found in the case of M'lle Morlacchi, who, as most of our readers are aware, has pur-chased a farm on the outskirts of the town of Billerica, on the Boston and Lowell railroad, about twenty miles from **ORDINANCE.**
